To whom it concerns,

I have known and worked with Adbongo and their founder John Bush since 2007 when our firms bid together on a web site design and development project for the Ctiy of Austin.

Around that time I was familiar with John through Peter Strople, a mutual colleague that we share, and Peter suggested to me that John's progressive nature would make my firm more competitive in our bid for such a major municipal project. So, naturally, I had high expectations of John from the moment we first met. And from that moment on, John has not disappointed me once, and, in fact, he and his highly creative firm are consistently delighting me with their approach to building community and a sustainable marketplace focused on triple bottom line results.

In 2011 Adbongo joined the GoLab coworking facility and it was then that he offered to assist me with developing it into a more organic ecosystem. Through John's coaching and influence I was inspired to change GoLab from a traditional co-op into a small business incubator model that will help create new jobs and transform many lives. Our ecosystem has experienced tremendous growth since Adbongo joined and we are currently in the middle of a hyperlocal expansion plan that promises to revitalize Austin's historic east 6th Street area.

Given my direct experience working with John and his company, I recommend any co-op that wants to take it to the next level call Adbongo, and then you too can benefit from their sustainability initiatives, knowledge capital and resources.
